Getting down to business

Re: Spence emerges to meet with GG (Jan. 12). Chief Theresa Spence now has the ear of the prime minister and top government officials, so it is time to stop her hunger strike and get down to the business of dealing with the issues.

These are important issues to the aboriginal people, but at this point the attention has become focused on her starvation.

Spence noticeably looked frail and tired and had trouble walking. She is not going to have energy left to fight the true battle. Even several chiefs were publicly urging her to end her protest, as she is putting her health in danger.

Spence may have helped bring the issues to the forefront of the media and that is a good thing. Now she has overdone it. She has made the major issue her own health and this is deflecting attention from the difficult issues that need to be resolved.
